PURPOSE AND STRUCTURE OF DOCUMENT

Substance use disorders and/or alcoholism can wreak havoc on an individual's life and the lives of their family and friends. They can cause repeated absences and poor work performance resulting in loss of employment, neglect of familial responsibilities, problems with interpersonal relationships, loss of family and friends, and repeated contact with the criminal justice system. Individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism are often unable or unwilling to voluntarily submit to treatment. As a result, many states have enacted involuntary commitment statutes to provide for the detention and treatment of individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism.

This document will first provide a summary of the most common involuntary commitment provisions across the nation followed by a series of charts with detailed information on each state's laws. Please note that the focus of this memorandum is on civil commitment rather than on commitment of individuals with criminal charges who are ordered to undergo treatment as part of their sentence or in lieu of serving time in jail. Additionally, statutes regarding protective custody of individuals who are impaired or incapacitated by alcohol or drugs are not included in this memorandum. Further, this memorandum does not discuss involuntary outpatient treatment.

SUMMARY OF INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT LAWS

The first proposal for a “sober-house hospital” to treat alcoholics was made by Benjamin Rush (Founding Father and Surgeon General in the Continental Army) in 1812.¹ This was followed by calls by others for the creation of asylums to treat inebriates in 1830 and the founding of the first “embryo asylum” at Boston’s Washingtonian Hall in 1845.² There was much discussion of involuntary commitment of alcoholics, with various opponents arguing that treatment was ineffective, that the certification process was suspect, and that morality should not be legislated.³ In the face of this opposition, fourteen (14) states nevertheless enacted involuntary commitment laws for inebriates during the last half of the 19th century.⁴ Following prohibition, consumption of alcohol was barred and use of narcotics was criminalized, making commitment of persons with alcoholism or addiction superfluous as these individuals were often incarcerated.⁵ Commitment laws for individuals with substance use disorders made a resurgence in the 1960s following “a series of U.S. Supreme Court decisions that decriminalized alcoholism and addiction.”^{6,7}

Currently, thirty-seven (37) states and the District of Columbia have statutes in place allowing for the involuntary commitment of individuals suffering from substance use disorder, alcoholism, or both (see the national map on page 7). In five (5) states (Indiana, Maine, Nebraska, Tennessee, and Virginia), substance abuse and alcoholism are specifically included in the statutory definition of mental illness or mental disorder, making involuntary commitment of a person with a substance use disorder and/or alcoholism the same as the civil commitment of an individual with a psychiatric condition. The majority of states, however, specifically exclude substance use disorders and alcoholism from their legal definition of mental illness or mental disorder, which is likely due to criminal court considerations with legislators not wanting criminal defendants who committed a crime while under the influence to be able to plead an insanity defense. In total, twenty-four (24) states exclude substance use disorders and alcoholism from the statutory definition of mental illness or mental disorder. Eight (8) of those states (Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, Illinois, Nevada, New Hampshire, Oregon, and Wyoming) do not have separate involuntary commitment provisions for individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism, while the remaining sixteen (16) states do have separate commitment procedures for substance use disorders and/or alcoholism.

A further twenty-two (22) states make no reference to substance use disorders or alcoholism in their mental illness or mental disorder definitions. Of those, four (4) states (Maryland, New Jersey, New Mexico, and Utah) have no separate involuntary commitment provisions for substance use disorders and/or alcoholism. New York includes alcoholism, substance dependence, or chemical dependence in its definition of “mental disability.”⁸ However, substance use disorders and alcoholism are not mentioned in its definition of mental illness, nor is there a separate provision for involuntary commitment of individuals with mental disabilities, substance abuse, or alcoholism. Seventeen (17) states do not reference substance use disorders or alcoholism in their statutory definitions of mental illness or mental disorder, but have separate involuntary commitment provisions for individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism.

Of the thirty-seven (37) states with involuntary commitment laws for individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism, Montana and Rhode Island only provide for involuntary commitment of individuals suffering from alcoholism, while Vermont only includes provisions for persons with drug addiction.

There are many commonalities among the states with regard to their involuntary commitment provisions. In every state, individuals sought to be committed have the right to an attorney or, if they cannot afford an attorney, to have the court or other committing agency appoint an attorney to represent them at every stage of the proceedings. Every state also grants individuals the right to petition for a writ of habeas corpus at any point after they have been committed. The purpose of a writ of habeas corpus is to have the court determine whether the person’s detention is lawful and, if not, to order the release of the individual.

Other common rights afforded to individuals during commitment proceedings include the right to have a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing date, to present and cross-examine witnesses, to be examined by a medical or health care professional of his or her choice (usually at their own cost, unless the individual is indigent), and the right to appeal an adverse ruling. The individual also has the right to be present during the hearing or trial, although a court may determine that the individual’s presence in the courtroom would be detrimental to his or her health, in which case the court will keep the individual from attending and appoint a guardian ad litem to represent the individual’s interests in the proceeding. A guardian ad litem is different than an attorney in that a guardian’s duty is to protect the best interests of the individual, which may not always be what the individual wants, whereas the attorney’s duty is to act according to his or her client’s wishes. Additionally, in most states, individuals have the right to maintain communication with family and friends, their attorney, and clergy as well as the right to send and receive mail that hasn’t been intercepted, read, or censored.

⁸N.Y. Mental Hygiene Law § 1.03 (2016).

In general, individuals that may petition to have a person suffering from a substance use disorder and/or alcoholism committed include the person's spouse, guardian, relative, or health care professionals, including a physician, physician assistant, advanced practice registered nurse, or psychologist. In some states, any responsible adult with knowledge of the circumstances may petition to have the individual committed for treatment. In other states, commitment proceedings may only be commenced by the administrator or director of a treatment facility or hospital where the individual has been receiving treatment on an emergency basis.

The maximum period of commitment for individuals with substance use disorders and/or alcoholism runs the gamut from 24 hours to five days for emergency commitment proceedings to up to one year for involuntary commitment proceedings. In most cases, the maximum amount of time an individual can be detained is set out in statute; however, as mentioned above, the individual can petition for release via a writ of habeas corpus at any time. Additionally, the director or administrator of the facility where the individual is being held can release him or her at any time if the director or administrator believes that the individual is no longer in need of inpatient treatment. In some states, the director or administrator must receive court approval prior to discharging the individual, while in other states, the director or administrator must only notify the court that the patient has been discharged. As part of the discharge process, the director, administrator, court, or other committing agency may require that the patient continue treatment on an outpatient basis and, if the individual fails to cooperate with outpatient treatment, he or she may be remanded to the custody of the treatment facility.

States require that the involuntary commitment of individuals for inpatient treatment of a substance use disorder and/or alcoholism be the least restrictive alternative to treat the individual. If an individual can be adequately treated on an outpatient basis, the court or other committing agency is generally required to either dismiss the proceedings or will order the individual to submit to outpatient treatment. If the individual fails or refuses to cooperate with outpatient treatment, the court then has the option of detaining the individual for intensive inpatient treatment at a public or private facility.

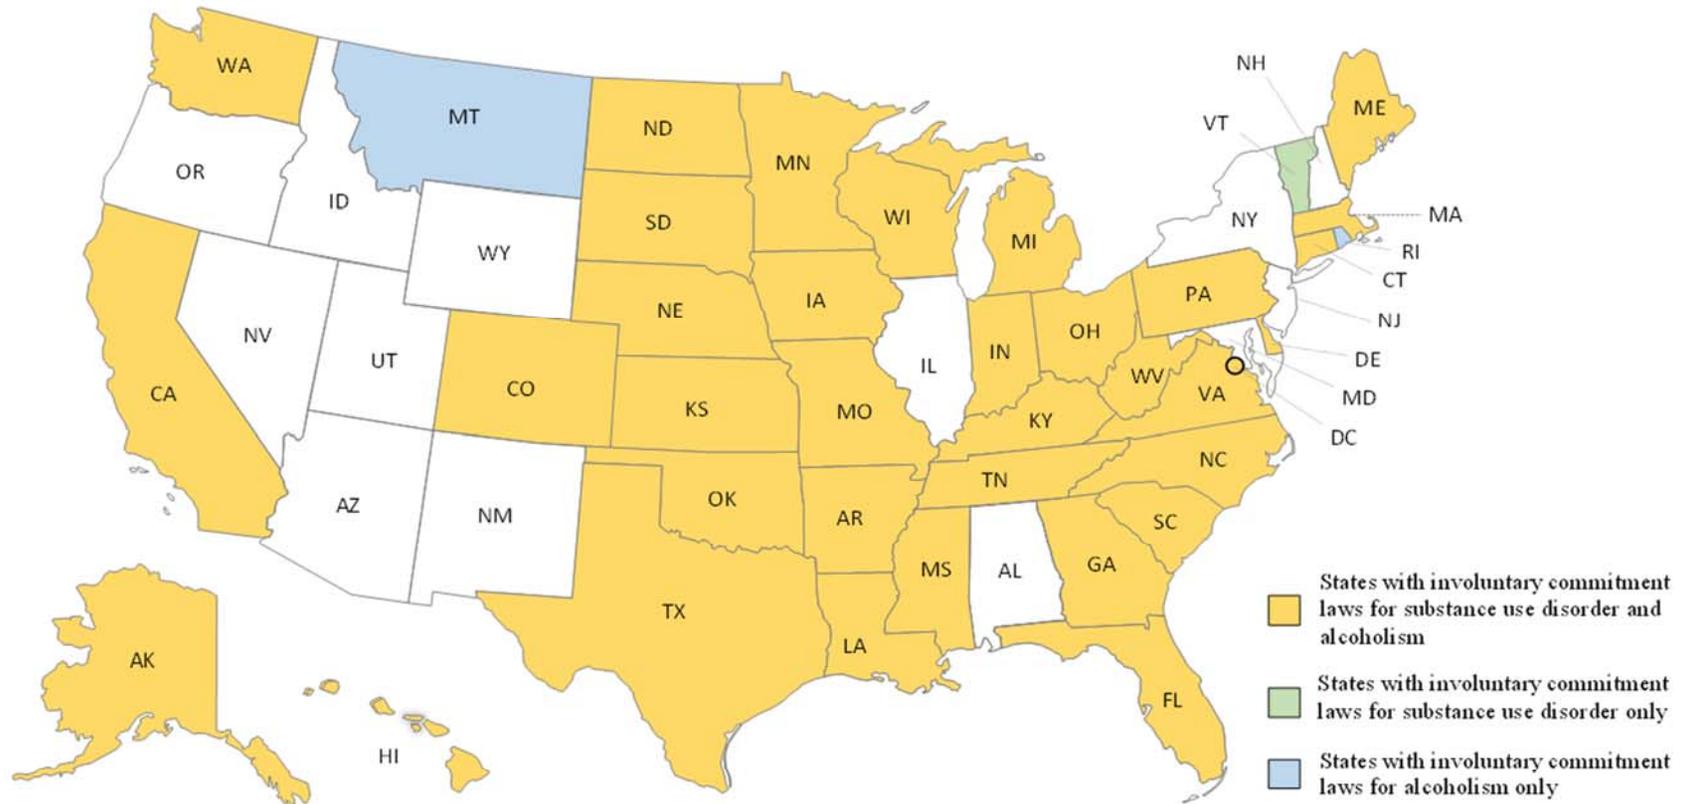

If, at the end of the original commitment period, the director or administrator of the facility where the individual is being detained believes that he or she is in need of further treatment, most states allow the director or administrator, or other interested party, to bring recommitment proceedings to extend the period of time during which the individual can be detained. The maximum detention period for recommitment is generally longer than the original commitment maximum.

Every state with involuntary commitment provisions for individuals with a substance use disorder and/or alcoholism requires that the court or other committing agency find that the individual meets the specific requirements for detention by clear and convincing evidence. In other words, the petitioner has the burden of showing that the allegations of the petition – that is, that the individual is a person in need of treatment – are substantially more probable than not. This is not as high a burden as in criminal cases, where the standard is beyond a reasonable doubt.

In most states, the petitioner must allege circumstances beyond just that the individual sought to be committed has a substance use disorder or is an alcoholic. Typically, there must also be evidence that the individual has threatened, attempted, or inflicted physical harm on himself or herself or another, or proof that if the individual is not detained, he or she will inflict physical harm on himself, herself, or another, and/or that the individual is incapacitated by drugs or alcohol such that he or she cannot provide for his or her basic needs, including food, shelter, and clothing, and there is no suitable adult willing to provide for such needs. A suitable adult may be a family member or friend.

Two other provisions that will be set out in more detail in the charts below are: 1) civil and/or criminal liability or immunity for petitioners and others involved in the civil commitment proceedings; and 2) payment for treatment of the individual sought to be committed.
